Rebranding best practices during times of mergers and acquisitions
During this time of increased merger, acquisition, and divestiture activity, it’s important for the companies involved to establish clear brand management guidelines. M&A activity is of interest to three unique groups: stakeholders, employees, and customers, as well as larger communities of investors and regulators. They’re all asking the same questions: What does the future of this company look like, and what does it mean for me? This guide will help companies navigate M&A activity through brand management efforts that help to improve the corporate reputation of all those affected by the changes.¹

Brands involved in M&A activities that clearly define the new organization’s value proposition captured 2x the revenue synergies.¹

What can brands do to ensure success post merger or acquisition? One of the first things they may want to do is rebrand. But before you can rebrand, the first and most critical step is to find the connective tissue between two companies and communicate the value proposition that the new combined company brings. The question many will ask is: Why would two companies that are successful on their own bring greater opportunity and value to their clients as a single entity? Brand management helps answer that question by exposing the thread that links the two companies—not only by what they do, but why they do it—and can help inform the new company’s point of difference in the market.2

Align business and brand strategy.

M&A activities mean change, and investors generally don’t like change. So, soon after an announcement or deal, brands need to convey confidence and positivity. Things are changing, but for the better. In particular, investors will be looking at three things.

1. Clearly and consistently communicated company values and long-term goals via brand presence
2. Customer and employee trust and engagement
3. Differentiated proposition and brand experience

2 HBR, Don’t Make This Common M&A Mistake, 2020
LinkedIn is deeply trusted by its investor audience, meaning companies often use the platform to manage their brand efforts around M&A activity. There are a variety of ways in which these efforts play out on the platform, but there are some universal truths.

How M&A activity plays out on LinkedIn.

Make a strong announcement.
When Intuit completed its acquisition of Credit Karma, they issued this eloquent statement to customers, spelling out their “why” and the “so what.”

Take a unified approach to your corporate brand.
Accenture has taken this approach through its dozens of acquisitions in the last few years. Their new brand campaign is built around the unifying thought of “let there be change.” The campaign speaks to the company’s brand DNA and is brought to life seamlessly across all aspects of its brand.

Diversify your content formats.
To effectively reach your diverse buyers, invest in audio, video, written blog posts, infographics, and interactive experiences to resonate with all your audiences.

Focus on your employer brand.
Take a moment to recognize your employees and share new policies.

Double down on executive communications.
Jesse Levinson, CTO/co-founder of Zoox, led an “Ask Me Anything” virtual town hall about the company’s future after their acquisition by Amazon. As a brand, Zoox invested in thought leadership for its subject matter experts to showcase the company’s innovations and commitment to rider safety for its suite of autonomous vehicles.

Be consistent.
If there’s a change to the acquired company’s visual identity, aim for brand distinction and consistency across all platforms.
Get your marketing operations in order.

There’s no one-size-fits-all approach to a brand refresh in the case of M&A, a new company launch, or a divestiture. It’s highly individual and dependent on many factors. That said, there are some best practices around communications post merger. The key to success is bringing your teams together to make major brand decisions.

Establish a streamlined operational model. Organize a social center of excellence that meets regularly to review progress, brainstorm new content ideas, and share plans across each channel for better efficiency and message consistency.

Create internal brand guidelines. Document the visual, editorial, and brand mission guidelines so all marketers and creators have a North Star.

Test and learn. Your content strategy and approach to collaboration should continuously evolve based on what you learn.

Elements of a successful operating model

- Center of excellence

  Assemble your team leads into a center of excellence to provide resources, training, and strategy to all marketing leads to reduce costs, increase efficiency, and provide standardization.

- Effective communication

  After the COE is established, audit your processes. How often should you meet? How should information on performance and content plans be disseminated?

- Tools to collaborate

  At minimum, you’ll need:
  - A centralized repository for all assets across channels
  - A centralized content calendar
  - Project management tools
  - Measurement tools

- Shared measurement framework

  All leads should be aligned on specific KPIs for each stage of the funnel and for each channel, and be able to report back regularly on progress.
