Linked in

7 Eye-Opening Stats

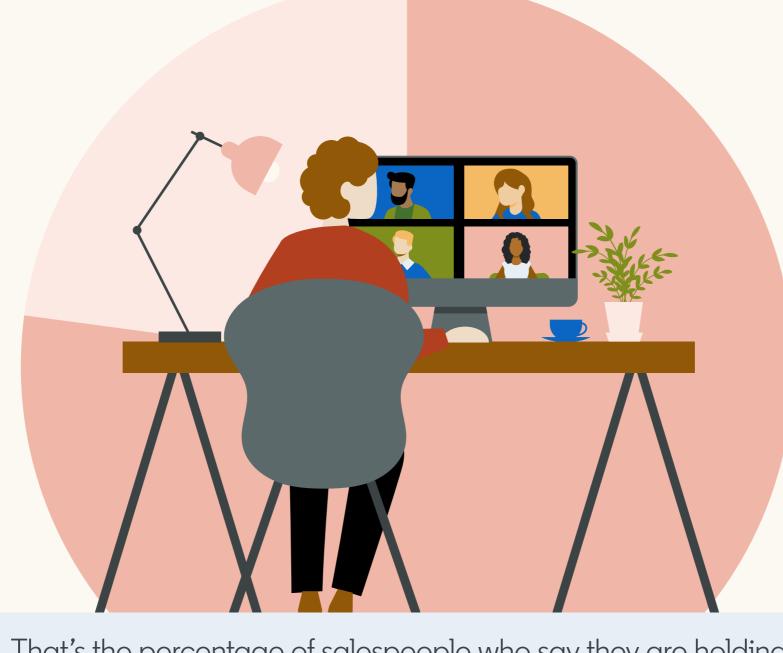

Illuminating the Future of Sales

In LinkedIn's Global State of Sales report, one of the most telling findings is that leading through change is now a required skill for sales managers. Fully 76% of sales managers agreed that a manager's capacity to navigate change is more important than it was five years ago.

COVID-19 has only accelerated change in the sales profession. It has forced sales organizations to embrace virtual selling, to ramp their use of sales technology, and to boost the role of customer satisfaction—as opposed to quota—as the leading metric for measuring sales performance.

Here are seven eye-opening stats from the State of Sales report that shine a light on the fast-changing profession of sales:

77%

That's the percentage of salespeople who say they are holding more virtual meetings in the wake of COVID-19. With limited face-to-face meetings, virtual selling is becoming essential.

metrics to measure sales performance. The metric of customer satisfaction outranked both individual quota and team quota.

as "trustworthy." Interestingly, while buyers may distrust the sales profession in the aggregate; they do trust some salespeople—88% of buyers agree that the salespeople they do business with are "trusted advisors."

76%

84%

10K

Surveyed more than 10,000 buyers and sellers in 10 countries: Australia, Brazil, Canada, France, Germany, India, Mexico, Singapore, United Kingdom, and United States. The scope of the global State of Sales is comprehensive.