“The digital world is here to stay. The inefficiency of travel, of in-person business meetings, and of late-night dinner appointments will make face-to-face meetings less common and not necessary in many cases. Organizations will use more data, more video, and more telesales. I do not believe we will go back to the world that was.”

Shaan Hathiramani, CEO, Flockjay

In a fast-evolving environment where innovation is happening more quickly and in more locations, tech sellers need to provide superior experiences at every stage of the buying journey, anticipate customer needs, and make data-driven agility a core element of their practice. In short, tech sellers need to act like tech companies.

It’s not that the power of personal bonds and the traditional tools of sales are no longer important, it’s that they are now bolstered by the power of tech. Digital transformation in the world of sales means adding insight to intuition informed by experience.
Sellers in tech who embrace digital transformation close more deals.

According to McKinsey research, the most successful B2B sellers prioritize digital interactions, use digital channels to sell, and offer more seamless customer experiences using digital tools.¹

Top-performing B2B sellers engage customers digitally

- 32% of high performing B2B sellers have more than half of their customer interactions on digital channels.
- 42% of high performing B2B sellers generate more than half of their revenue from digital channels.
- 68% of high performing B2B sellers combine digital and traditional channels for a seamless customer experience.

Put the tech buyer first

The shift to digital channels poses a challenge for buyers. The volume of information available to buyers creates a need for sellers who view themselves as part of the buyer circle as partners.

77% of B2B buyers say that purchases have become very complex and difficult.²

“Today’s buying journey has effectively reached a tipping point where it’s become nearly un navigable without a significant amount of help.”

Brent Adamson, Principal Executive Advisor, Gartner.

Digital tools help you understand who your prospects are, and what they need at every step of an increasingly complex buying process.
